Surgeons have long dreamed of performing minimally invasive procedures without opening a patient's chest, but while robots are often used to spot tissues or implants, they have been difficult to control. Now, however, researchers have demonstrated that surgeons can guide robotic arms using intuitive gestures, making it a lot easier for doctors to navigate the battlefield of the inner body. The researchers, led by Stephen Paik of Seoul National University Hospital in South Korea, report in the journal Scientific Reports that they can accurately control a robot arm to guide a scalpel down through a patient's skin and muscles. "The robot arm can follow commands from the fingertips of the surgeon in real time, independently of the camera, all while operating on patients in a hybrid OR," says Paik, who is professor of biomedical technology at Seoul National University. The team ran 20 trials where surgeons performed two types of operations, using motions picked up through the robot's fingers to operate a surgical robot that was moved to different locations. The trials all took about 90 seconds to complete, and the surgeons reported they were comfortable with the robot in their hands. While it may sound great to have an autonomous device at the whim of a finger – and ultimately a patient's hands – that still comes with a catch. For one, surgeons

While the findings from the small study haven't been published yet, the nature of the research means that it raises the question of whether there is any link between the number of mobile phones people carry and their risks of cancer, diabetes or other diseases," said Dr. John Adler, a professor of preventive medicine and biomedical sciences at the David Geffen School of Medicine at UCLA. "The bottom line is that right now there is no convincing epidemiological evidence that there is a link between mobile phone use and cancer risk," Adler said. California law restricts the use of cell phones to hands-free use. At the time of publication, the state's Airborne Toxic Event law was under appeal in a state supreme court case that could extend the hands-free mandate to all cell phone use in California. The study authors declined to discuss their results, citing the pending litigation. Study of seven volunteers found that when the cell phones were tested during phone calls, they emitted radiation levels that exceeded state and federal safety recommendations. Three of the seven participants tested had their cell phones' signals turned off or in airplane mode, but received non-ionizing radiation at levels above the safety recommendation. In one case, the researcher found radiation levels of 100 milliwatts per square centimeter while the phone was in airplane mode. "There is great variability" from person to person, Adler said. "This is not what is meant by a low dose." The higher radiation levels were detected between 11 a.m. and 6 p.m. during the workday, the researcher said. The length of time a cell phone is being used when radiation is detected is also important to determining the level of risk, Adler said. Study co-author Christoph Trese of the University of California, San Francisco, said it is unclear what the harmful effects of the radiation might be. "It is still too early to say anything definitively about harm from radiofrequency radiation," said Trese, the vice-chair of the FCC's technical advisory panel. "We do know that the fetus is more sensitive to radiofrequency radiation than adults. We also know that there are potential effects on the nervous system, in particular the developing brain 3e33713323
