Photo: Tishman Homes Source: Tishman HomesQ: Necessity of calling fork() in a child process I have a simple c program with parent and child process. Both process share the same address space and registers. I have observed that the child process is not necessary to call fork() in the child process to create a child process. In such a case, why? #include #include int main() { printf("Calling fork() "); pid_t pid; pid = fork(); printf("pid of child process is %d ",pid); printf("Returned by parent process "); return 0; } Output: Calling fork() pid of child process is 0 Returned by parent process I observed this program in 64 bit Ubuntu.
